論文摘要

This dissertation pays critical attention to the "community" concept in archaeological research, casting it as the flexible and impermanent loci of identity formation and social reproduction. In three articles, it investigates various iterations and transformations of the Arikara community in North Dakota after the ethnohistoric record of the Upper Missouri River to investigate how increased flexibility in Arikara settlement in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries yielded new community configurations, with particular emphasis on Arikara coresidence with Mandans. The second article analyzes archaeological spatial data to elucidate how the organization of open space at the early twentieth century settlement of Like-A-Fishhook Village structured interactions between the Arikara and the Mandan-Hidatsa. The third article navigated the reconfiguration of their community space as a result of allotment policies during the early twentieth century, and the settlement of Nishi is situated in the social memory and contemporary identity of the Arikara people. The Arikara case study demonstrates that spatial configurations of community are not always commensurate, and that understanding the multidimensionality of belonging requires both archaeological and ethnographic approaches.

This study explored the experiences of Anglo individuals, born in the United States, and of the participants who were experienced in coaching individuals from other cultures. All 12 participants were members of professional coaching associations. The individuals being coached, were either immigrants (the first generation born outside the United States) or children of immigrants (the second generation born in the United States). Data collected from in-depth interviews with each participant indicated that cross-cultural coaching could have many benefits to the coachee and the coach; however, cross-cultural coaching can also have many challenges. The six themes that emerged from the data collected include (a) cross-cultural coaching context from the Anglo coaches' perspectives, (b) coaching approaches—U.S. culture versus outside the culture, (c) Anglo coaches' characteristics for coaching individuals from other cultures, (d) challenges of coaching individuals from outside the United States, (e) benefits of coaching individuals from outside the United States, and (f) strategies for overcoming the challenges of cross-cultural coaching. The study expands the coaching literature from two different perspectives: (a) the cross-cultural coaching dynamics and (b) the strategies of
