MUSIC AROUND THE WORLD

Our planet is full of music. In the air birds call; in the deep oceans great whales sing across vast distances; on the ground crickets chirp, wolves howl, and humans, no matter where and how they live, make music of myriad kinds.

This is a section full of human music from all over the world. There are enough examples to give an impression of the incredible range and variety of human music-making across the earth's continents: different sounds, different forms, different places, different occasions, different reasons for making music. The examples span both space and time: they come from around the globe and from various points in history, from ancient times to today.

There are different kinds of folk music, religious music from several traditions, and art music or classical music from various parts of the world (but not popular or commercial music). Some of this music was created for listening to and some for participating in; some of it is made by people who get paid to do it; some by people whose pay is the music itself. The selection includes music from the Western classical tradition, as this is such a strong part of the musical history and identity of several nations.

A collection of music from around the world could go on and on and on. This is just a glimpse of the earth's musical variety... every track can be seen as a door to more discoveries!

Robert Garfias is a very experienced ethnomusicologist, which means that he studies music from all over the world, but not just the music - also the people who make it and the places it comes from. Some of the tracks here are his own 'field recordings'. He has chosen most of the other tracks to include too, and written much of the information about them.
